Recorded in the company of house-trained rabbits on an industrial estate in Cambridge, Daylight Moon, Ezio's ninth studio album is their most personal yet. The visceral honesty of frontman Ezio Lunedei's lyrics is laid bare in tracks like 'Indian', an ode to feeling overcome by forces beyond his control, and 'Dirty Little Secret', a Nick-Drake-esque ditty where he tries to unpick the emotions of an unnamed muse that he just can't quite suss out.

In their 26-year career, the band have made a habit of dabbling in any style of music that takes their fancy; Daylight Moon is no different. From the crunching blues-rock guitars of 'Crushed' to the jazz rhythms of 'The Gypsy Song', there's plenty of genre hopping on show here.

What's always set Ezio apart is the connection between Lunedei and guitarist Mark "Booga" Fowell. The frontman's rich tenor and complex acoustic guitar work is complimented by Booga's incessant lead guitar; regularly squeezing in an extra note that shouldn't be possible, but somehow managing to work. One could try and compare him to other great guitarists, but they would be wasting their time – Fowell truly has a unique style, and it needs to be witnessed in the flesh.

To celebrate the release of Daylight Moon, Ezio will be touring Germany throughout November and December, and will return to the road again in the spring with dates in Britain and Germany. Fans can expect favourites from the new album and classics from Ezio's ever-expanding repertoire.

As well as gigs with the duo of Lunedei and Booga, the band will perform a handful of dates as a bigger ensemble. Undoubtedly one of the best live acts from the UK, Ezio have vowed that there will be no set lists, so expect every single show to be different.
